Subject departments at James Nash have purchased a wide range of high quality materials to support teaching and learning in classrooms. While subject departments will develop their own specific guidelines with regard to how resources should be handled, the following principles inform all classroom resource use:

- Subject departments select material resources after considering how they will support specific learning outcomes.
- Subject departments provide a wide range of resources from which teachers are able to choose.
- Teachers preview and assess all resources before they put them into class use.
- Subject departments have policies in place with regard to how potentially contentious material should be dealt with.
- Teachers need at all times to be aware that despite a very careful and thoughtful selection of such resources, it is still possible that some of what we use might give offence to students and their families.
- Parents have the absolute and final right to ask that their children not be exposed to any resource they object to. In such cases, alternative resources will be made available.
- Parents who wish to exercise this right should contact the school when they feel it necessary to preview any resources.
- The school does not see its role as another censor but will abide by all censorship rules common in society.
- Students have the right to object to a specific resource if they consider that resources are offensive. In such cases, alternative resources will be made available.
- A list of resources for each subject at each year level will be published annually for parents and students to preview.
